

If you use another person's work but fail to properly include either in-text citations or a reference list, then you commit plagiarism. See the tutorial on Citing & Referencing provided by the university.

How to Cite Videos/Films in Your Essay

When you mention a film title in your essay, the film title should be written in italics. Authors will usually cite the production year in bracket after the film title. Please find Schneider's (2008) article "Three modes of experimentation with art and ethnography" as an example of in-text citations:

"All three works share a sense of experimentation which pushes the boundaries of their respective genres (film, video, photography, and installation), and are based on a profound engagement with the lives of others, characteristic of ethnography. I shall first discuss Michael Oppitz's epic film Shamans of the Blind Country (1978-81), and then Juan Downey's video (and installation) work among the Yanomamö (especially his video The laughing alligator, 1979), and finally, Sharon Lockhart's film and exhibition Teatro Amazonas (1999)." (Schneider, 2008: 172)

In the reference section, authors will make a sub-section titled "films," "video," to cite film or video references:

REFERENCES

Films

Schamanen im Blinden Land/Shamans of the Blind Country. Michael Oppitz, Nepal/Germany/USA. 1978-81.

Teatro Amazonas. Sharon Lockhart. USA. 1999.

Video

The laughing alligator. Juan Downey. USA. 1979. Video.

If you watched the film Breathless on DVD, use the citation format for DVD (not the film original) as follows:

Breathless (À Bout de Souffle). Jean-Luc Godard. 1960. DVD. Criterion Collection, 2007.

If your work is a found footage media work, you still need to provide references as above. If your work will be released commercially, please seek agreement and license from the copyright owner.
