

Plagiarism in Art

1. Guidelines for SCM Students

- Honesty is the keyword. Your intention to cite or use someone else's work has to be clear.
- You should include full reference of other's work in the credits of your artwork if possible.
- Every project and assignment should have a written component (e.g., a written report for a Graduation Thesis/Project), which must include:
The reference list, that is, a list of full reference of others' work at the end of the written document AND
The in-text citations. You should make it clear which part of your work (e.g., visual design, game mechanics) is related to the referenced works, and the degree of relevance.
- Citing does not save you from plagiarism! The intention, the context and the cited length are all important. It will still be considered as plagiarism if you copy too much from sources, whether or not you use citation and referencing, so that the assignment shows too little of your own thought.
- Negligence also does not save you from plagiarism! You should know and reference your sources fully and clearly.
- If you are not sure please consult your teacher!

2. Examples of visual plagiarism

- Jeff Koons – Art Rogers

„The law has very firmly and thoroughly come down on the side of copyright ownership. Artists may not have their work copied for others' profit, no matter how inartistic or freely available other people may judge their work to be. Copyright matters. „

- William Klein – Galliano

Galliano's fashion house used similar visual design (right) as William Klein famous French artist (left). Paris court decided Galliano violated Klein's copyright and ordered Galliano to pay Klein.
